First up this week is the Trefecta DRT, and this electric-assisted mountain bike is really something special. First of all, since it was the first question on our minds, the battery and motor are no joke. Although you're supposed to be doing the pedaling most of the time, the DRT can reach speeds of 43 miles per hour unassisted and travel for up to 60 miles, and again, that's if you don't pedal at all and just use the motor.

But of course, you are supposed to be able to pedal around on your own, so they designed it with a lightweight aluminum frame, automatic, electronic shifters, and even an electronic suspension system to make your experience as fluid as possible. Right in between the handlebars they designed a display that give you details like speed, distance, gear, battery life indicators, and suspension.

But it gets cooler. It also comes with smartphone integration and a dedicated place to house your phone while you ride. So how much is this super pimped out mountain bike? Well, as usual on Aspire, this is where we have to give you the bad news. It's rumored to be starting at $25,000, so not exactly wallet friendly. But since it's cool we wanted to share with you anyway. And speaking of -- if you need any additional details, just check the link below.
